1. Presenter

Jesus Pulido holds a Ph.D. in architecture and has taught in Spain and Chile before joining the University of Tokyo in 2019.

He is a Project Assistant Professor at the Center for Global Education (GlobE), where he teaches scientific writing and global liberal arts courses on sustainability in architecture and urban planning.

His research interests include the relationship between architecture and well-being and how university campus design helps our students create a sense of place and belonging.

2. Abstract

We spend more than 90% of our lives in indoor spaces, yet we know little about how the built environment influences our well-being.

This talk introduces a research line I am developing in my GLA courses, which bridges architectural design and higher education.

Within the broader concept of global competence, I examine the relationship between educational architecture and well-being, exploring how campus design affects students' experiences and how these experiences shape the definition of space and place.
